Africa in the Fiction of Nadine Gordimer

RICHARD I. SMYER

NADINE GORDIMER has pointed out that for modern man Africa has come to represent an inner condition — an aspect of his “spiritual consciousness,” a “state of regeneration,” and an “untapped source” of energy within himself toward which he may be seeking “the dangerous way back.” Inspiring hope as well as uncertainty, “this Africa is . . . only a new name for an old idea — man’s deep feeling that he must lose himself in order to find himself.”¹ Gordimer has described herself as a “romantic struggling with reality,”² and it is Gordimer the romantic who is aware of Western man’s longing to venture beyond the limits of his own world, beyond his conscious identity, in search of a vital centre, a primal wholeness and energy, within the Africa within his own psyche. Gordimer is, however, enough of a realist to know that those who have been drawn to the continent often have been more intent on asserting the permanence of a familiar racial and cultural identity — for Western man, his identity as master. In South Africa the result has been apartheid, which is only one aspect of what Gordimer has noted as the fragmentation of a society lacking a common language or history and unified neither by ties of ethnic kinship nor by a shared social or political ideology.³

The polarity of the romantic quest for a psychologically regenerative wholeness and the realistic recognition of diversity and isolation may reflect a deep structure of the South African experience. The history of the land is that of fragmentation and the assertion of separateness extending past the modern Pretorian
